

'UK still haslinks with BOSS'

By Peter Daley

THE government is to be asked by Ministers in the House of Commons today whether it is in a better position to monitor the South African security service.

The House of Commons will vote on the Foreign Affairs Committee's report on the South African security service.

The report, which was published last week, says that the South African security service is a highly sophisticated and well-organised organisation. It is headed by the Chief of Defence Intelligence, Major-General Sir John Stammers, who is also the head of the South African Defence Intelligence Agency (SADIA).

The report says that the South African security service has a wide range of capabilities, including the ability to intercept communications, conduct surveillance, and carry out sabotage operations. It also has a large network of agents and informants throughout the world.

The report also says that the South African security service has a close relationship with the South African government, and that it is used to carry out the government's foreign policy objectives.

The report concludes that the South African security service is a major threat to the security of the United Kingdom, and that the government should take steps to improve its ability to monitor and counter the activities of the South African security service.

The report also says that the South African security service has a close relationship with the South African government, and that it is used to carry out the government's foreign policy objectives.

The report concludes that the South African security service is a major threat to the security of the United Kingdom, and that the government should take steps to improve its ability to monitor and counter the activities of the South African security service.

Clipped By:

cliff_shardalow
Mon, Feb 15, 2021